“Why do we learn?”

Ms. Ayu Hakuta

Have you ever wondered about this?

I think everyone has thought about this. When did humans start to learn?
And when did they start to study?

Humans evolved from apes about 7 million years ago. Humans already had brains to think and learn at the time. Or (What does not learning mean?)

When someone makes the same mistake repeatedly, we often say “Why did you do that again? You should learn from the mistakes you made.”

Is this the meaning of learning? Everyone makes some mistakes, right?

It is probably the environment you grew up in or the feeling you have that determines either you want to learn something or not. I think so.

What did you learn when you were little? What you learned has become common sense and common knowledge for you, right?

But, it’s all different and depends on where you learned.

Therefore, we have differences.

The world is now full of prejudice, discrimination and conflicts. They are often based on what happened in the past, but we are also responsible for today.

We didn’t learn enough from history or didn’t try to understand people out of our own premises.

We shouldn’t be narrow-minded! Open your hearts! Let’s try to learn and understand others. Learning is probably necessary to understand and respect others and to live in harmony with others.
